The Reach Of Plastic Man

WOOZY WINKS industriously polished the filing cabinets in the office of the FBI Chief. It wasn't his job, and he hated jobs anyway, but if he didn't work, he couldn't stay in the office and hear what was going on—and he wanted to hear, even if it made him mad.

The one who did all the talking was Zouzou La Belle, the loveliest lady in the secret service of the Republic of Parata, and the subject of her scoffingly scornful remarks was Plastic Man, the supple pride of the American Federal Bureau of Investigation.

"But to be sure," said Zouzou, "he can stretch long, he can reach for. Yet to what purpose? Perhaps for dishes on a boarding house table, for pill bottles on a high shelf. Let him reach far, far for a criminal—such as Parata's most hated bandit, Monstrime—and he will fail, because the criminal need only be somewhere he does not reach."

"Darn that snippy dame!" mumbled Woozy. The chief, however, only smiled courteously at Zouzou.

"Of course," said the chief, "a long reach isn't the only talent Plas has. He can model himself to resemble anybody. Can you change your appearance, Miss Zouzou?"

"No, and why should I?" She drew herself up, proudly and prettily. "My appearance, it is a weapon the most important. I am here in your country to capture Monstrime, I have a clue to his lurking place. By my beauty I shall charm and drug him while your Plastic Man stretches here, reaches there, to find him where he is not. Adieu, mon chief. I return with my prisoner while you think over what I say."

She shimmered out, a veritable walking parable of glamorous confidence in her powers. Woozy snorted.

"That stuck-up dame!" he cried. "If Plas had been here in person to hear what she said—"

"Oh, he was here," said the chief. "He's here now."

The chair in which Zouzou had been sitting suddenly shook itself, stood up and became Plastic Man.

"If she has a clue, I'll follow her," said Plastic Man. A long, elastic stride took him out of the window and along the street after Zouzou.

As for Zouzou, she applied makeup as she walked. A touch of rouge, a quick skillful line of lipstick, did the impossible and made her more beautiful than ever. As she reached the door of the Club Cobra, easily the most sinister cabaret in the Western Hemisphere, she smiled in anticipation of triumph. In she walked. A tip to the head waiter got her a table at a point where all could see her, and all who did see her took a second look. But she looked back only at the ruggedly handsome man who lounged in a shadowed corner, sipping a tall drink. From the photographs she had studied, she knew him for Monstrime. She gave him a smile that would stir the blood of a mummy, and winked one lustrous eye.

He lifted his glass to her, and she lifted hers to him. A moment later, he crossed the floor and sat at her table.

"You will join me, fair one?" he asked.

"But why not? It is pleasant here—"

"Better still would be the private dining room I have engaged. There I can tell you properly my worship of you. Come."

This was success already achieved. Rising, Zouzou accompanied Monstrime to the private room. There she smiled again. "Sir," she improvised, "I look to our better acquaintance—"

"You know who I am," he snarled. "And I know who you are, Zouzou La Belle. Do you think I will let myself be led back a prisoner? Here, this waiter is in my confidence. We'll whisk you through the secret door into the alley, and thence to destruction. Open the door, waiter."

The waiter, ordinary looking and obedient, did so. "Outside," commanded Monstrime. He peered through the door toward the black closed car that waited in the alley. "Ready to take you away, I see. Here, waiter, take this gun and guard her." He passed it over.

"Thanks," said the waiter. "Get in, lady. Get in, Monstrime."

They did so, and in got the waiter. He levelled the gun at Monstrime. "Okay," he said, "drive to FBI headquarters."

"Sure thing, Plas," said Woozy at the wheel. The waiter shook himself out of his crumpled dress suit, and the face of Plastic Man grinned at his two companions in the rear seat. It was hard to say which was the most horrified, Zouzou or Monstrime.

Later, when Monstrime was locked up, Zouzou spoke to Woozy.

"I underestimated your Plastic Man," she purred. "I would like to speak to him further, perhaps on other subjects than crime. Indeed, all he has to do is reach for me, and—"

"He's stretched himself away on another case," said Woozy. "Clear out of your life, Zouzou."
